FOREWORD

THESE statements presented by the auditors represent their summation of the financial operations of the Commission during the six years from September, 1914, to September, 1920. The detailed accounting information covering over 4,000 branch offices of the relief organization will require several volumes for publication and, with the slender resources available, some years may be needed for their issuance.

The great moral responsibility for full accounting was realized by the Commission from its first day. Therefore the precaution was taken to engage one of the leading international firms to audit every ramification of expenditure and receipts, and to make doubly sure they were also engaged to undertake the unusual task of themselves actually keeping the books and furnishing their own accounting staff at all principal branches.

The Commission was born as a purely philanthropic enterprise, dependent upon the charity of the world for support, conceived as a few months' emergency service to defend 10,000,000 people from certain starvation. However, it became evident that the war was not a struggle of months but of years, and that if these 7,500,000 people in Belgium, 2,500,000 in Northern France were to survive, it must be accomplished by much broader operation than public charity. The Commission, therefore, sought and ultimately received financial support from the Belgian, French, British, and later the American Governments. These official advances were, by consent of the Belgian and French Governments, debited to them and were finally placed in the Reparations settlement for preferred payment under the indemnity. The organization thus rapidly grew to a great economic engine with an annual budget of over $400,000,000 in all its different ramifications inside and outside of the invaded regions. Carrying on its operations with the moral support of the neutral powers, it came to have many attributes of a government in itself, possessing an agreed immunity from the restrictions placed by belligerent powers during the war, flying its own flag, issuing its own passports, operating a large fleet of ocean vessels, owning and operating a great number of canal boats, extending its offices into many countries, requisitioning the native food supplies, rationing the entire population, making full provision for the destitute, operating mills, factories and transportation, and, in fact, engaged in maintaining the whole economic cycle of a nation.

An understanding of the accounts requires some conception of the method of the organization. A primary division in operations was established between the provisioning of the population and the care of the destitute. The basic theory of administration was to erect a system of food supply with all of its train of handling agencies, stretching from the interior of the United States, the Argentine, Australia, India, and other great food centers, focusing into Rotterdam with a distribution through chains of primary and secondary warehouses, ultimately, through a ration card, reaching to the individual family, which paid for the food supplied at fixed prices. Destitution grew rapidly under the occupation and, of the 10,000,000 people, fully 5,000,000 were wholly or partially destitute before the end of the war. A separate branch of administration was organized for the care of these destitute giving them assistance to purchase ration cards and by charitable public eating and clothing establishments. Their needs necessarily extended further afield than the provision of imported food and clothing—because bare living requirements necessitated supplies of native foodstuffs, fuel, light, shelter, medical care, as well. The provisioning side was organized in the form of a commercial enterprise, transferring its cash receipts to the benevolent side of the administration for the use of the destitute. This plan of division greatly simplified the accounting and gained the administrative values of a separate personnel more adapted on one hand to commercial administration and on the other to charitable work. It further made possible the exaction of a small profit from the sale of food to those who could afford it, and thus swelled the resources of the benevolent branch.

The whole plan of organization was a continuous chain of decentralization. Purchasers were decentralized into overseas branches. Shipping control was directed from London. Transportation inland to primary warehouses was directed from Rotterdam. A committee was erected in each of the ten Belgian Provinces and six French Districts, which may be compared to a wholesale distribution. These committees in turn supplied 4,500 Communal Committees which may be compared to retail distribution, they issuing food under the ration cards issued on a family basis and to the public eating places for certain classes of destitute. The rations were sold for cash by the Communal Committees, who in turn paid cash to the Regional Committees the Regional Committees paid cash to the National Committees at Brussels and Lille, and these cash receipts were transferred to the benevolent side.

Three methods were employed in benevolent organization. First, existing charitable institutions were supported and, in the case of children, were extended to cover the whole child life of the country. Second, certain professions and trades were assisted to care for the members of their professions. Third, benevolent committees were set up in each Commune for the conduct of public eating places together with provision of ration cards to the destitute and to supervise other agencies and for the care of those not otherwise reached. Overlaid upon the whole structure were a series of checks and balances to determine the truth as to destitution, to maintain the morale and efficiency of the administration and honesty in accounting.

Thus, keeping in mind this organization, it will be found that the C. R. B. accounts proper show debits to the National Committees at Brussels and Lille for the value of commodities furnished to them and show credits for the amounts allotted to them for benevolent purposes. At this point ends the actual balance sheet of the C. R. B. The National Committees, under the direction and as the agent of the C. R. B., in turn debited commodity values to the Regional and Provincial Committees and credited them with benevolent allowances, and at this point ends the accounting of the National Committees. Again, the Provincial District and Regional Committees set up the same accounting relation with the Communes. And over the whole, the C. R. B. maintained an audit, and also maintained membership in the whole committee structure of these organizations which acted as agents of the commission. In later years, the native food supply had to be requisitioned and to be impressed into the system of distribution. These forced purchases were carried out by the Communal Committees for the account of the Provincial and District Committees and where a proven surplus in a given commodity existed in the hands of Regional Committees, it sold its surplus to neighboring Provinces upon the direction of the central organization. Thus, the purchases of native food supplies do not reflect into the C. R. B. balance sheet, although they represent an expenditure of probably $400,000,000. If time and funds permit, a balance sheet of all branch offices will be consolidated and will be of interest from a historical point of view showing gross purchase and sale of foods and clothing of upwards of $1,300,000,000 during the period of operations.

In the balance sheets are shown certain residues of funds remaining in the hands of the relief organization, accruing as a final balance after provision had been made for the care of the destitute. These final residues of funds have been applied at the request of the Belgian and French Governments to the provision of extended foundations for charitable work, to be maintained as a memorial of American help in the time of need offered through the Commission for Relief in Belgium.

The principal officers of the Commission gave their services without salary and in many instances paid the whole of their own incidental and traveling expenses as well. Shipping firms, accountants, insurance agencies, buying agencies, throughout the world gave their services without charge otherwise than the mere out-of-pocket incidentals. The distributing committees of over 55,000 members gave their voluntary services over these many years. 40,000 Belgian and French women dedicated themselves to the saving of the child life of their nations. Never was there greater pressure for economy and efficiency upon an organization. At no time were the population fed to more than the point of bare subsistence. Every penny saved meant larger food supplies and less suffering. At no time were the finances of the Commission certain for more than a few months, and at different periods its liabilities were in excess of its actual or prospective assets, and the continuous food supply was only maintained through the personal guarantees of the directors and their friends. The total administrative expenditure was held down to less than one-half of one per cent., (exactly $42/100$ of 1%) of the entire operation. The record of economy may be extended even further than this, for the changing tides of war often required the diversion of cargoes and sales of foodstuffs outside of Belgium to meet emergency readjustment of purchases or supplies whose shipment or distribution had already been arranged. Upon these and similar transactions entirely outside of Belgium and France a balance of profit of over nine and one-half million dollars was earned, several times greater than all overhead expenditures. From these profits on outside operations the Commission, first, paid its entire administration and overhead expenses; second, paid over to the Benevolent Department some $2,600,000 for charitable distribution in Belgium and France; and third, as at 30th September 1920, still held available for Relief work in those countries and to meet the expense of Liquidation approximately $3,120,000—since that date largely distributed. The economy of operation in the organization has, in fact, even a higher standard of test than this, in that the average prices maintained for food supplies in this occupied territory during the entire period of war will show from 15 to 20 per cent. less than the prices in the Allied countries at the same periods.

No set of accounts or figures can reflect the intense anxiety, the patience and skill required of the 55,000 volunteers who toiled in this complex agency, defending ten million lives. Inspired with humane sympathy for these people, who, having no responsibility for the war, suffered most from its hardships and barbarities, they labored that this service might be done efficiently and with economy. It is to their unflagging devotion that we are now able to publish exact figures of accountability for funds, and to trace each ton of food from the place of purchase to the ultimate consumer among the civil population of the invaded regions. Surrounded by terror and suffering this multitude had but little concern for the bookkeepers in the back rooms of the 4,000 branch offices of the relief organization. It was of the utmost concern, however, to those in official direction, not only that the work might be effectively performed and presented to the world, but that our honor and the honor of our country in this trusteeship should never be challenged.

*The "Profits" here referred to are the result of a marginal charge made to cover equalization of prices, war destruction, fluctuations in exchange, and to support the destitute. It also reflects the voluntary service of the members of the Commission and the concessions and special privileges granted to the Relief Commission by individuals and by railways, steamship, telegraph, insurance and brokerage companies all over the world.

Includes estimated balance to be distributed at final liquidation.

†The distribution between France and England of these subsidies for Belgium is unofficial and subject to adjustment between the respective governments.
